

Reclaiming the Profession of Medicine

The hope of many physicians is to have a chance to break away from the oppressive controls of corporate medicine and to return to an independent model of medical practice. If we take an honest look at the depth of corruption that has been exposed in this country, the prospect of restoring medical care with integrity seems dim. A legislative solution does not appear possible—elected officials’ actions collectively push us toward communism. A parallel system of medicine may not last long in a communist country, although it may persist for a time. We need to begin searching in earnest for root causes of the current dilemma so we can discern how it could be resolved.

In previous president’s letters, I pointed out the importance of recognizing the root causes of corruption in medicine: the enemy within, hidden in plain sight and masquerading as a friend, a broken and corrupted judicial system, and drug and human trafficking, especially child sex trafficking. At a more elemental level is the failed election system that has not been corrected because elected officials and their donors benefit from it. Their silence and lackluster responses tell us they are complicit in the cheating.

The complicated regulations that disrupt medical care were created by federal and state legislatures, benefiting their corporate friends. This explains why the current system continues to plunder taxpayers’ financial and personal data. We never saw meaningful change until President Trump used executive orders to curb the power of pharmacy benefits managers (PBMs) and to allow “for right to try,” among other actions. A list of his achievements is found archived at Healthcare—The White House (archives.gov).

COVID-19, the unseen enemy that was announced on Mar 11, 2020, highlighted much of the built-in corruption of the agencies that influence the medical profession, as well as the apparent weakness of physicians, who were unable or unwilling to resist the oppression. The propaganda and confusion were played on both sides of the COVID narrative, using divisive and inflammatory rhetoric to influence the outcome of the presidential election.

Communists operate by attempting to take over the narrative on both sides, the goal being to become the face of the targeted population (those who will resist the tyranny), gain their trust, and mislead and misdirect them until they become a mockery to the rest of society. It is a method of psychological warfare that has been used to overthrow governments in countries around the globe, and the U.S. is known to have participated in it. The medical profession has been so well trained to trust and absorb information and scientific explanations by “experts” that it was vulnerable to the various disguises put on by the enemy seeking control through medicine.

Sometimes suffering is necessary to expose deception. A person is more likely to treasure truths learned through hardship. Reflecting on the fear and dread that enveloped the nation in 2020, it was the pain of that experience that drove many to search for truth. In just a few years since then, many of us now understand more about the evil of the world’s elite globalists, the consequences of elections, and how elections can be manipulated. We learned to recognize the fake news and fake science.

Regardless of individual perspectives, few people trust the media today. It is interesting to note that almost all of us have learned about world events, politics, scientific advancements, and cultural trends either from a television screen or computer screen. How do we know that our beliefs about what we learned from the news are true? Even a deeper look requires screen access for most research. As a nation we have collective experiences that are based on what we viewed on the screen, not in person.

Truth is something that each of us must discover independently before we can embrace it. It takes time, intention, and effort. I hope we all continue to search for it, each with his whole heart.

The foundation for rebuilding great medical care begins with the simplicity of the patient-physician relationship, using empiric knowledge gained over time, and applying the accumulated wisdom of experience to the art of healing. Every individual physician can do his best to care for and guard the lives of his own patients and his community. Those who have managed to build successful cash practices serve as an example to others. Such practices are not only less complicated but very capable of providing better care. On a broader scale, the more patients realize that they can receive excellent care without insurance, the more options for complex and extended care will arise.

Many individuals with integrity can certainly make a significant impact on the medical care system, even if initially they are only part of a parallel system. Ideally, the current system should be dismantled and built anew. That, however, would take an army, given the enormous power held by the system. If the people searched and discovered the darkness behind the corporations that prop up and feed off the existing system, they might get on their knees and cry out to God for mercy on this nation. In my opinion, that would make a world of difference.
